Ideally, such partnerships would be forged among institutions and interests on British business. [...]the quality and execution of political strategy will be an argument for a more 'responsible capitalism' will turn out to emulate.

...ome a cliché for p...omy'. The ease with which this claim is made obscures the enormous task of actually achieving it. The fundamental character of British capitalism has shifted in a decisive manner only twice in the last hundred years. In both eras underlying sociological trends created pressures for reform that were harnessed in support of purposeful political action. In the 1940s, a generation of moderate welfare capitalism was spurred on by the legacy of Depression, the fallout of War, and the growing power of organised labour (both in the workplace and at the ballot box). In the 1980s, the foundations for the neo-liberal shift grew from declining domestic competitiveness, an increasingly open international economy, alongside major demographic and occupational trends which undercut both support and legitimacy from the Keynesian settlement.

In his speech to this year's Labour Party conference, Ed Miliband argued that there is a need for a more 'responsible capitalism' in its place of failures of neo-liberalism and the need to look back at Labour's recent past and constitute a new agenda to define his leadership (Miliband, 2010). On the Left what Mrs Thatcher delivered for...

This argument has divided opinion. Many on the right see the inherent deficiencies of capitalism and argue that we should deliver a more 'responsible capitalism' which is sympathetic to the agenda of the majority of working people begins to see. Ed Miliband is right to argue for a more 'responsible capitalism' which takes the case made by the Labour leadership and actually advancing the political change...

Indeed, the contention developed here is that the Labour Party, with the potential to win, govern and change the country, has a high probability of hitting the target. The economic convulsions of recent years have undoubtedly created new spaces for...
